THE STOICS ON LANGUAGE AND REALITY (Dissertation Abstract)

My project reconstructs the early Greek Stoic theory of the relation between language and reality by focusing on the theory of lekta. I argue against the consensus view that lekta are primarily the meanings of speech by showing that lekta are items which account primarily for the performance of speech acts. This offers novel solutions to puzzles such as the completeness of complete lekta, the difference between superficial and genuine speech, and the sense in which lekta are mind-dependent. I then argue against dominant interpretations of the structure of complete lekta by showing that the subject terms of lekta are not material qualities, nor purely abstract entities. Rather, lekta are partially constituted by bodies, indefinite parts, or “cases” (ptōseis). A central contribution of the project is my novel reconstruction of cases as particularizing events. With an account of predicates as the effects of causation between bodies, I show that all of the constituents of complete lekta are items that are real outside of the context of language, and become unified by a speech act. This new reading of the Stoic theory better coheres with source texts, and offers Stoic responses to puzzles in contemporary philosophy, such as the status of the content-force distinction and the problem of the unity of propositions.
